The Origins of Chainmail

Chainmail is an ancient form of armor used by warriors for centuries. Its origins can be traced back to the Celts in the 3rd century BC, but it was the Romans who truly perfected the craft. Made from interlocking metal rings, chainmail was designed to protect the body from attacks during battle.

Over time, chainmail evolved from armor to a symbol of status and fashion. Kings, knights, and noblemen would wear intricately designed chainmail garments as a display of wealth and power. Today, the craft has transitioned into a beloved art form enjoyed by hobbyists and artisans alike.

By utilizing different materials, such as steel, aluminum, or even colorful polymer rings, you can create endless variations of weaves, colors, and patterns. 1. European 4-in-1

The European 4-in-1 is the most basic and widely used weave in chainmail. It involves each ring passing through four others, creating a dense and sturdy fabric. This weave can be used for making bracelets, necklaces, and even armor.

2. Byzantine

The Byzantine weave is a more decorative and intricate pattern. Each ring passes through four others, creating a chain-like effect. This weave is perfect for creating stunning necklaces and bracelets that are sure to impress.

3. Full Persian

If you're up for a challenge, the Full Persian weave is the way to go. This complex weave produces a dense and flexible chain that is often used for bracelets. Once you master this technique, you'll feel like a true chainmail maestro!

A Personal Note From The Author:

This second volume blends 10 years of my personal experience chainmailing. When I first started chainmailing, I knew nothing about it except what I'd seen online or in movies; chainmail armor. Not very exciting for the average person but the idea of weaving metal rings into something I could create without any special skills appealed to me. I stumbled across The Ring Lord, a site that sells all kinds of rings in all kinds of sizes, colors, and metals, and I was hooked!
