Little did he know, those cinematic experiences would pave the way for his extraordinary career.

At the age of 18, Joseph Alexander joined a local film club, which opened the doors to a whole new world of cinema. He immersed himself in classic films, foreign masterpieces, and contemporary blockbusters, devouring every frame, every line of dialogue, and every burst of emotion. At first, it gained a small following, but his meticulous analysis and eloquent writing style quickly caught the attention of cinema enthusiasts and industry professionals alike. One of his most notable contributions to the world of cinema critique is his extensive review of Alfred Hitchcock's masterpiece "Vertigo."
