It was a time of great struggle and resilience. The year was 1970, and the city of New Orleans was bustling with life, culture, and music. But for a group of individuals, their reality was far from glamorous. This article takes you back in time to explore the forgotten stories of the old and poor in 1970 New Orleans.

The Forgotten Generation: The Plight of the Elderly

In a city known for its vibrant atmosphere, the elderly found themselves living in the shadows of poverty. With limited access to healthcare, inadequate support systems, and scarce resources, their daily existence was filled with hardships.

Pension funds were minimal, leaving many seniors struggling to make ends meet. The lack of a solid safety net further exacerbated their situation, forcing some to rely on the kindness of strangers or local charities to survive. Every day was a battle against isolation, hunger, and despair.

Many African American families lived in overcrowded and unsanitary conditions. Education and employment opportunities were limited, leaving numerous individuals trapped in a cycle of poverty. The struggle for equality was far from over, and it heavily affected the older generation who had already faced a lifetime of institutional discrimination.

Charles and Eva, 79 and 92, respectively, are not too old to love, live together, laugh, and pull antics that are the entertainment for a tightknit neighborhood of unusual characters in 1970's New Orleans. Supported and protected by those living around, they are as happy and secure as the very old and poor without kin can be. That was the case, at least, before the hurricane struck, its waves surging through the streets with incredible force, inundating stable neighborhoods, and providing the ultimate challenge to those in the city like Charles and Eva.

Hurricanes, like Katrina and Camille, are natural disasters to endure, to clean up from afterwards, and from which to move on. There is no one to blame. But the one that overwhelmed Charles and Eva was different, although no less devastating. It was unleashed by humans, spurred on by avarice, and justified in the name of the public good.

This bittersweet romance, an account of an old couple and their neighborhood, is based on a true story. It is a tale of triumph, despair, conspiracy, joy, hypocrisy, and defeat in no particular order. It is a story of tough truths that should force soul-searching after the last page has been turned.

Without further ado, I present to you Charles and Eva.
