Letters to Byron began in 2013 when I started writing weekly letters to my four-year-old son, caught in the crossfire of adversarial British family-law during that most vulnerable time when parents separate. These letters became one constant parental reminder in that ever-changing landscape of disappointment. Without fail, I had a weekly appointment when I sat down to spend time with Byron across the written page. Letters to Byron was written live, weekly by public blog, where the WordPress counter showed over 1 million pages read during the four-year duration of this weekly writing, although it also showed that Byron had not visited the page. It was as if I had been made invisible to him. As he had been in the family court process. In September, 2020, I ended the weekly commitment 'Letters to Byron' required. All 121 letters appear in chronological order as a legacy of that time.
