Despite the current waves of feminism and gender parity regulations raging globally, homemaking still constitutes a considerably vital topic in the family setting because every home deserves a homemaker in order to be run effectively. Home making is the act of taking care of a home in all aspects; emotional, financial, social, spiritual, physical, material in order to create and maintain a balanced and healthy environment for all of its members. The state of the home affects the wellbeing of the individual members that live in it.

In as much as mainstream economics stresses the advantages of full employment for women however it doesn't prevent women from taking care of their homes as wives and mothers because women by nature play a crucial role in homemaking.

Homemaking may differ in many cultures as a result of time factor, family traditions and sometimes religious beliefs but still, the woman is the sole administrator of the home because she is considered as the "Queen of the House" who pioneers housekeeping, meal preparation, taking care of the children and her husband. It is important to note that individual values are vital in the context of choosing between homemaking and full time employment.

Does full time employment outside the home prevent a woman from homemaking? Certainly not because one can be employed and still manage the home. This position has a strong biblical backing as seen in Proverbs 31:13 (KJV); "She seeketh wool, and flax and worketh willingly with her hands" Even the contemporary society we live in does not really encourage full time house wife status because of prevailing financial instability. On a personal note, I am of the opinion that a woman should work and also take care of her home. That is why in this book, I will enlighten the reader on what it takes to be a good homemaker.

Homemaking is not meant for little girls but rather women who have made up their minds to use their feminine power to influence their homes and generations in a godly manner.

This book is a must read for every Christian woman across the globe.
