In reading a few of the excellent and detailed histories of Andover and Exeter, I noticed that when writing about one of the two schools, an author would include scant acknowledgment of the other. It's not surprising, since they are separate subjects, and the schools are competitive with one another in sports and other venues. Although their names, Phillips Academy and Phillips Exeter Academy, are well known, it is not commonly known that their founders were nephew and uncle, that the schools were conceived at the same time, often in the same living room, and with the shared fervent mission of preserving the Puritan faith as well as educating youth.
