Exploring the Haunting Streets

If you dare to venture into The Devil Town, prepare yourself for an otherworldly experience. The streets are lined with dilapidated buildings, their boarded-up windows a testament to the town's grim past.

Legend has it that those who cross the bridge at midnight will encounter the Devil himself. It is said that he appears in the form of a cloaked figure, offering forbidden knowledge and dark bargains to those daring enough to make the crossing.

While many dismiss these tales as mere folklore, some brave souls claim to have had encounters with the Devil on the bridge. These individuals speak of glimpsing his glowing eyes, hearing his sinister laughter, and feeling an overwhelming sense of dread.

In The Devil's Town, Philip Leigh, a rising star among American historians, tells the unique and colorful story of the small resort city of Hot Springs, Arkansas--- how it became a theater for New York and Chicago mobs during the gangster era. This is a richly detailed tale of a significant part of Southern history--- exploitation of a people's poverty, crime, evasion of law, and local and state corruption. The author names names, some of them of national importance including, among others, Frank Costello, Al Capone, Myer Lansky, "Jelly" Nash, Nick the Greek, Thomas Dewey, J. Edgar Hoover, and presidents Roosevelt, Truman, Kennedy, and Clinton.

Even as an author of four Hot Springs books, The Devil's Town entertainingly amplified insight into my hometown

—Ray Hanley, author of A Place Apart: A Personal History of Hot Springs
