

The Enthralling Tale of Faded Dreams And Forbidden Pictures

Once upon a time, in a quaint little town nestled deep within the forest, lived a young girl named Lily. She had an insatiable curiosity and a fondness for dreams. Every night, as she closed her eyes, an entire world full of endless possibilities would unfold before her. These dreams were her refuge—a place where she could soar high above the clouds and escape the shackles of reality.

But as time went on, Lily found herself growing weary of her dreams. They no longer felt as vibrant and alive as they once did. They started to fade, bit by bit, until they became nothing more than mere fragments of her imagination. She desperately yearned for the vividness of her dreams to return, but she couldn't figure out what had caused them to lose their luster.

One day, while exploring the attic of her old, creaky house, Lily stumbled upon a dusty, forgotten album filled with photographs dating back to a time long ago. The images depicted scenes of a forbidden love—a torrid affair that had been kept concealed from the prying eyes of the world.

It is a disturbing and powerful personal story about ethnic profiling. Written by a suspected terrorist, this is a book about racial profiling in the USA, its politics, and its hypocrisy. The author, a North African freelance photographer, takes us inside the issue of ethnic profiling in the aftermath of 9/11. He writes about his encounter with the Illinois state police, the call from the FBI, and the traumatic interrogation that followed. Blending humor and anger, Zighen tells about his personal journey from North Africa to achieve his dreams and goals, only to be suspected of terrorist activities. He manages to tell a succinct story about ethnic profiling in the post 9/11 era and to speak out against it. He drags the reader into the politics, draws parallels between the Algerian police and politicians and their American counterparts, revealing the US Administration's deafening silence about human rights abuses in his native Algeria. Was there a case of American Paranoia on Route 66 in the aftermath of 9/11? Can an innocent citizen live without fear in America? These questions remain to be answered.
