Survival homesteaders can learn a lot from the Amish. In our high-tech era of smartphones, movie live streaming, and Alexa, these plain folks are still managing sustainable off-grid homesteads and thriving businesses without any of the luxuries of the modern world.

There are approximately 300,000 Amish folks living around the country. Exactly how each Amish family lives and works varies based upon the cultural standards in their individual communities. A visit to an Amish community or farm is always quite illuminating – but rarely the same experience twice.

An Amish person's life, regardless of sex or age, is centered around work. You don't get to lounge on the couch just because you're sick, there's two feet of snow outside, it is a holiday, or you're tired from being up all night binge-watching something on Netflix.

There is a lot of joy in the Amish day, with the bulk of it stemming from enjoying the simple and natural pleasures in life and from the sense of a job well done, not going out to dinner, to the mall, or playing with hand-held tech gadgets.

Home decor takes a massive back seat to functionality. It takes a copious amount of workspace to preserve food, cook food from scratch, sew clothing for the family, and start seeds for the coming year's crop.

The Amish live and work either in their home or a short distance (walking or horse-drawn buggy ride) from it. While working from home is ideal for homesteading, it is not a requirement for success.

But if you spend an extensive time away from the homestead for either work or pleasure, you won't have time to work the land properly in order to feed your family from what you grow and raise. You also won't have time to chop, split, and stack the firewood you need to heat your home, among many other things.

A strong work ethic is instilled, demanded, and highly praised from a very young age in Amish culture. There is a direct line between doing your assigned tasks well and keeping the family warm, fed, and clothed.

Regardless of the slight differences in cultural standards, all Amish families in America live off-grid. None of them allow electricity in their homes. If an Amish family purchases a modern home, they either tear the electricity clear out or have the service disconnected and stubbed off in the walls. Some Amish have indoor bathrooms, others do not.
