In 1850, Pinkerton founded what would later become the Pinkerton National Detective Agency. The agency's primary goal was to provide private detective services to individuals, businesses, and even the government. Their services encompassed a wide range of detective work, including undercover operations, surveillance, and forensic analysis.

A Revolutionary Approach to Crime-Fighting

What set the Pinkerton Agency apart from other detective organizations of the time was their commitment to innovation. Allan Pinkerton and his agents pioneered many investigative techniques that are still used today. From developing mugshot databases to using disguises and infiltrating criminal enterprises, the Pinkertons revolutionized the field of detective work.

The Pinkerton Agency quickly gained a reputation for their relentless pursuit of criminals and their ability to solve cases that stumped other law enforcement agencies. Their groundbreaking work earned them the trust of influential clients, including American presidents and major corporations.

From Outlaws to Presidents: The Pinkertons in Action

Throughout their history, the Pinkertons were involved in numerous high-profile cases. One of their most notable successes was foiling an assassination plot against President Abraham Lincoln in 1861. Acting on a tip, Allan Pinkerton personally ensured Lincoln's safe passage through Baltimore, averting a potential national tragedy.

The Pinkertons were also instrumental in bringing down notorious outlaws such as Jesse James and the Wild Bunch. Their relentless pursuit and meticulous investigative work led to the capture and demise of these felons, cementing the Pinkerton Agency's legacy as formidable crime fighters.

The Decline and Legacy of the Pinkerton Agency

As the 20th century dawned, the Pinkerton Agency faced new challenges. The rise of government-funded law enforcement agencies diminished the demand for private detectives. Additionally, the agency's reputation for union-busting activities during labor disputes tarnished their image.

Despite these difficulties, the Pinkerton National Detective Agency continued to operate and adapt to the changing times. Today, the Pinkertons offer a wide range of investigative services, including corporate risk management and security consulting.
