Throughout history, we've tried to classify people into different groups according to their personalities in an attempt to understand "why they do the things they do." This is the basis for all psychology. Why does one person lie and another tell the truth? Why does one person cheat and another remain faithful? The word archetype comes from the Greek archein, meaning "original," and typos, meaning "pattern." So an archetype is an original pattern. In psychology, it's a pattern of thought present in the human psyche. The theory of archetypes can be well applied to relationships. The ways in which we relate (or don't relate) to another person also emerge from our subconscious. We have witnessed this truth for many years, working as psychologists and intuitive counselors and hearing every type of love scenario imaginable. We've worked with women who desperately desired the emotionally unavailable man, women who sought to escape the overwhelming man, couples that fell out of love then back in love, and men who realized they had been living a lie and actually loved other men. You name it, we've heard it. In listening to tens of thousands of cases over time, something interesting happened: we noticed that the same types of people kept cropping up—people unrelated to each other but displaying almost identical qualities and comportment. As soon as a client started describing the man she was dating, we could almost finish her sentence, because we knew what came next based on the archetype she was describing. We began to comprehend that personality traits descend from archetypes and that a person's very behavior...
